is now in Washington, D.C. lobbying for those changes. With him is Kenley Brunsdale, an attorney Hansen hired to help represent the county, who formerly was on Owens's staff and helped write the first draft of the bill.

Their goal is "no net change" in the amount of water available to the county as a result of the Jordanelle project and the county's general philosophy is that it should not be required to spend any money to accomplish that goal. Since most of the project water will be for Salt Lake County, Wasatch County doesn't think it should be required to contribute any more money to counter its impacts on the county than it already pays as a member of the water district.

Rep. Bill Orton has shown particular interest in the county's objections to the bill and is preparing an amendment to protect both Wasatch and Utah County water rights, which is being called the "Orton Amendment". Wasatch County officials report Owens plans to work with Orton on the amendment.

City Council Settles Pawn Broker Issue

In a three-to-two vote, the Heber City Council last week decided to leave the business license ordinance governing pawn brokers as it is.

One of the city's two pawn brokers had protested that the new fee schedule, put into effect last year, was unfair. He said their business licenses should be based on gross receipts, the same as other local businesses, rather than requiring them to pay $250 per year and provide a $2,500 performance bond. He said his license would only cost him $25 if it were based on gross receipts.

Councilman Bob Morris, who cast one of the "nay" votes, recommended cutting the license fee in half. Councilman Wayne Clegg, public works department, at a total cost of $19,416. However, it was not the lowest bid submitted.

Trucks that meet the city's specifications could have been purchased for a total $17,790 through the state. But the council discussed the long-term advantages of purchasing the trucks locally and decided to "shop at home". The Ford trucks also exceed some of the city's specifications.

The other two bids were $20,995, submitted by Spencer Auto, and $22,597, submitted by Coet Chevrolet, both local businesses.

The council approved swapping its property behind the Wasatch County Courthouse for land owned
